THE END

On the day before Halloween, a small boy named Harry knocked at the door of Mrs. Larkin, not far from where he lived.

When she answered the door, he said, "Mrs. Larkin, I want to give you some protection."

"Protection from what, Harry?"

"From the kids tricking you on Halloween night. You know me, I always like to be helpful to my friends."

Mrs. Larkin tried not to wince. He was known around town as Helpful Harry—and sometimes he helped too much. He helped till it hurt.

Mrs. Larkin decided to take a chance. "How does your protection work, Harry? What does it cost?"

"Nothing, Ma'am. I just want to be helpful. I'll watch your property and make sure nobody does anything."

"Well, that's very nice of you, Harry," smiled Mrs. Larkin.

Harry left, glowing within. There was nothing like helping people. He decided to help the whole neighborhood where he lived on this side of town. He rang other doorbells and promised them the same protection.

Going home, Harry told his mother about it all, proudly.

His mother stared. "But Harry, just how are you going to watch all those places at once? Fourteen, you said."

"Golly, I never thought of that," Harry said in dismay. He had got himself into a pickle this time, promising too much. What made it worse was that a new boy, Knuckles Frazee, had moved into the neighborhood. Knuckles was big and tough and was just the type to play plenty of tricks all over the block tonight.

Mr. Bolton, the next door neighbor, saw Harry moping around with a long face, and asked him what was the matter. After Harry told him, Mr. Bolton said, "I'm glad . . . er, I mean, too bad you're in a mess, Harry."

Mr. Bolton was grinning inside, remembering the time Helpful Harry had dug up his whole garden in the spring, as a surprise, while Mr. Bolton was away on a trip. It was quite a surprise—especially since Harry had dug up all the tulip bulbs planted the fall before, ruining them.

If any tricks were played at the fourteen houses Harry had promised to protect, he would get blamed for letting it happen. Maybe this time Helpful Harry would learn his lesson.

But Harry suddenly jumped up. "I have a great idea how to keep my promise," he yelled. He went to see all the boys in the neighborhood, one by one, whispering in their ears.

This Halloween Eve turned out to be the quietest the neighborhood had ever known.

The next morning, Mr. Bolton called to Harry, who poked his head out of the window. "I heard the news, Harry. How did you guard fourteen places at once?"

"Oh, I didn't do it," grinned Harry. "I just told each boy that I heard Knuckles Frazee secretly planned to bring in a gang from the other side of town, to work tricks in our neighborhood. So each boy guarded his own house at night! I had nothing to do myself so I went to a movie."

"He did it!" thought Mr. Bolton, glumly. "He got out of his scrape . . . hmm . . . wait . . ."

Mr. Bolton said aloud, "Come out and look at your porch, Harry."

Harry came out and stared, turning a funny color. Stretching across the whole porch floor were big words in red paint—KNUCKLES FRAZEE WAS HERE.

"You should have guarded your own house, Helpful Harry," chuckled Mr. Bolton.
